Volcano Tungurahua Erupts, Caution Advised when Traveling in the Area

December 17, 2012

The U.S. Embassy in Quito advises U.S. citizens living or traveling in Ecuador that the Tungurahua volcano, located near the tourist community of Baños in central Ecuador, began to show an increase in seismic activity last week and remains in a state of heightened activity. Ecuador's Geophysical Institute reports that recent explosions at the volcano and ash discharges signify a renewed cycle of activity. As a result, the Secretary of Risk Management has raised its level of alert to 'Orange' (the second highest level), and a voluntary evacuation of people from Cusúa, Juive Grande and Chico as well as some areas of Chimborazo province has been instituted.

If you travel to the area around Tungurahua and the town of Baños, familiarize yourself with evacuation plans, monitor news outlets, use good judgment, and take all appropriate safety measures as volcanic conditions can change rapidly.

Past eruptions have affected air travel in Ecuador. U.S. citizens planning to fly to, from, or within Ecuador should monitor news outlets and have a plan in the event of flight cancellations.

Because Ecuador is in a region of frequent volcano eruptions and earthquakes, U.S. citizens residing in Ecuador should keep extra food and water at home and consider purchasing dust masks and heavy gloves to protect hands during ash clean-up.

For more information on current activity, visit the website of the Geophysical Institute, which monitors volcanoes and earthquakes.
